PURPOSE AND SUMMARY

The purpose of H.R. 3717, the “Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act of 2004,” is to provide the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) with enhanced authority to deal with obscenity, indecency and profanity on broadcast television.

BACKGROUND AND NEED FOR LEGISLATION

In 1961, then-FCC Chairman Newton Minow called television a “vast wasteland.” Today, over 40 years later, similar complaints continue to be made against broadcast television and radio stations. Increasingly, parents, educators, and families are concerned about the material that is broadcast on television and radio, and the effect the material has on America’s children.

Nielsen Media Research shows the average American watches 3 hours and 43 minutes of television each day – the equivalent of 56 days of nonstop television watching every year. Such viewing habits, particularly for children, have the potential to significantly shape their development, their education, and their outlook on the world. In a study on foul language on television, the Parents Television Council found that such language increased overall during every timeslot between 1998 and 2002. Foul language during the “family hour increased by 94.8 percent between 1998 and 2002 and by 109.1 percent during the 9:00 p.m. time slot.

Studies also show that parents are increasingly concerned. According to the Kaiser Family Foundation, more than four out of five parents are concerned that their children are being exposed to too much sex on television. A 1996 U.S. News and World Report survey found that 88% of Americans thought incivility was a serious problem. When asked about the consequences of this decline in civility, respondents cited an increase in violence, divided communities, and eroding moral values.

These concerns about programming content were exacerbated when, on Sunday, February 1, 2004, CBS broadcast the National Football League's Super Bowl XXXVIII, viewed nationally and internationally by 100 million people. The halftime show, which was produced by MTV, featured a performance by, among others, singers Janet Jackson and Justin Timberlake that ended in the exposure of Ms. Jackson's breast. Many Americans have complained that much of the halftime broadcast show, which is generally considered a "family friendly" event, was inappropriate for family viewing, particularly given that so many children were apt to be watching it on television. The Super Bowl incident garnered attention on its own, but was preceded by other television incidents, such as NBC's live broadcast of the 2003 Golden Globe Awards where the singer Bono used an expletive, and Fox's live broadcast of the 2003 Billboard Awards where actress Nicole Richie used a string of expletives. Broadcast radio is no better, and is arguably worse than broadcast television, with ample examples of indecent broadcasts by various "shock jocks." For instance, on August 15, 2002, the "Opie & Anthony Show" broadcast descriptions of a couple having intercourse in St. Patrick's Cathedral. The "Bubba, The Love Sponge Show" has also been the subject of numerous complaints for, among other things, graphic and explicit discussions of oral sex, masturbation, and other sexual activities. All of these examples have highlighted the need for stronger penalties for broadcast obscenity, indecency and profanity.

The outpouring of interest regarding these incidents is symptomatic of a larger feeling amongst many Americans that some television and radio broadcasters are engaged in a "race to the bottom" in order to distinguish themselves in an increasingly crowded entertainment field. In addition, individual performers and on-air talent appear to be engaged in a "race to the bottom" even though some licensees have instituted policies to prevent such conduct.

Congress has taken some steps to help parents steer their children to appropriate programming. For instance, Congress passed legislation requiring "V-chip" technology, that reads information encoded in the rated program and blocks programs from the set based upon the rating selected by the parent. Since 2000, all television sets with picture screens 13 inches or larger must be equipped with features to block the display of television programming based upon its rating. Congress also gave the broadcasting industry the first opportunity to establish voluntary ratings. The rating system, also known as "TV Parental Guidelines," rates programming that contains sexual, violent or other material parents may deem inappropriate. These ratings are displayed on the television screen for the first 15 seconds of rated programming and, in conjunction with the V-Chip, permit parents to block programming with a certain rating from coming into their home. Additionally, in 1990, Congress enacted the Children's Television Act (CTA) to increase the amount of educational and informational programming available to children on television. CTA requires each broadcast television station to air at least three hours per week of core educational programming and limits the amount of time broadcasters may devote to commercial matter during children's programming.

Despite these good efforts, more needs to be done. American families should be able to rely on the fact that, at times when their children are likely to be tuning in, broadcast television and radio programming will be free of indecency, obscenity, and profanity. Congress has given the FCC the responsibility to help protect American families in this regard. In light of recent television and radio events, it is evident that the FCC needs additional and enhanced authority to pursue bad actors. H.R. 3717 provides the FCC with that authority.

Although the FCC is prohibited from reviewing or prescreening television or radio programming for content, the FCC currently has the authority to enforce rules and laws restricting the broadcast of obscenity, indecency, and profanity. Federal law specifically prohibits the utterance of "any obscene, indecent or profane language by means of radio communication" (18 U.S.C. 1464) and the FCC is charged with enforcing this statute (47 U.S.C. 503). By regulation, the FCC prohibits the broadcast of obscene material at any time, and indecent material during the hours of 6 a.m. to 10 p.m (47 C.F.R. 73.3999), the time period when children are most likely to be watching television and listening to the radio.

Existing law gives the FCC the ability to pursue forfeiture penalties against licensees or permittees for broadcasting obscenity, indecency, or profanity. The penalty, however, is hardly a deterrent with a cap of only $27,500 for each violation. (47 U.S.C. 503(2)(A)). The FCC also has the existing authority to assess forfeiture penalties against nonlicensees, but only after first citing an offender, then waiting for a second offense to issue a forfeiture order. (47 U.S.C. 503(b)(5)), which makes it virtually impossible for the FCC to effectively enforce its indecency rules against nonlicensees. The current cap on fines for nonlicensees is a paltry $11,000, which, even if the FCC could invoke the two-step process necessary to fine nonlicensees, is hardly a deterrent to entertainment performers who often make more than ten times that amount for each performance. A much greater deterrent for nonlicensees is critical. In addition to forfeiture penalties, the FCC has the power to revoke any station license or construction permit for violations of the law or its regulations. (47 U.S.C. 312(a)(6)). License revocation, however, has never been utilized by the FCC for obscenity, indecency or profanity violations.

There is consensus that the current fines are too low and fail to act as an adequate deterrent to broadcasters and nonlicensees who may be inclined to continually push the envelope of decency to attract viewers and advertisers. H.R. 3717, among other things, attempts to remedy this problem by increasing the fines the FCC may levy for the broadcast of obscene, indecent, or profane material against licensees and nonlicensees, streamlines the process for penalizing nonlicensees, provides a reasonable time frame to ensure expeditious resolution of complaints, and makes license revocation and license renewal real options for the FCC if a broadcaster violates the indecency laws.

HEARINGS

The Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet held one oversight hearing on indecency and two legislative hearings on H.R. 3717. On January 28, 2004, the Subcommittee received testimony from: David Solomon, Chief of the Enforcement Bureau, FCC; Brent Bozell, President, Parent's Television Council; Robert Corn-Revere, Partner, Davis Wright Tremaine, LLP; and William Wertz, Executive Vice President, Fairfield Broadcasting Company. The second hearing was on February 11, 2004, and the Subcommittee received testimony from: Paul Tagliabue, Commissioner, National Football League; Mel Karmazin, President and Chief Operating Officer, Viacom, Inc.; and the five FCC Commissioners, Chairman Michael Powell, and Commissioners Kathleen Abernathy, Michael Copps, Kevin Martin, and Jonathan Adelstein. On February 26, 2004, the Subcommittee held a third hearing and received testimony from: Alex Wallau, President, ABC Television Network; Gail Berman, President of Entertainment, Fox Broadcasting Company; Dr. Alan Wurtzel, President of Research and Media Development, National Broadcasting Company; Lowell "Bud" Paxson, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Paxson Communications Corporation; John Hogan, President and Chief Executive Officer, Clear Channel Radio; and Harry J. Pappas, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, Pappas Telecasting Companies.

COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

On Thursday, February 12, 2004, the Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet met in open markup session and approved H.R. 3717 for Full Committee consideration, by a voice vote, a quorum being present. On Wednesday, March 3, 2004, the Full Committee met in open markup session and ordered H.R. 3717 favorably reported to the House, as amended, by a recorded vote, a quorum being present.

COMMITTEE VOTES

Clause 3(b) of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives requires the Committee to list the record votes on the motion to report legislation and amendments thereto. A motion by Chairman Barton to order H.R. 3717 reported to the House, as amended, was agreed to by a recorded vote of 49 ayes to 1 nay. Chairman Barton asked for and received unanimous consent to make technical and conforming changes to the bill.

COMMITTEE OVERSIGHT FINDINGS

Pursuant to clause 3(c)(1) of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee held a legislative hearing and made findings that are reflected in this report.

STATEMENT OF GENERAL PERFORMANCE GOALS AND OBJECTIVES

The goal of H.R. 3717 is to increase the penalties for violations by television and radio broadcasters and nonlicensees of the prohibitions against transmission of obscene, indecent, and profane material, and for other purposes.

NEW BUDGET AUTHORITY, ENTITLEMENT AUTHORITY, AND TAX
EXPENDITURES

In compliance with clause 3(c)(2) of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee finds that H.R. 3717, the “Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act of 2004,” would result in changes to budget authority, entitlement authority, and tax expenditures and revenues to the extent stated below in the Committee Cost Estimate.

COMMITTEE COST ESTIMATE

The Committee adopts as its own the cost estimate prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to section 402 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE ESTIMATE

Pursuant to clause 3(c)(3) of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the following is the cost estimate provided by the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to section 402 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974:

[Insert CBO estimate here]

FEDERAL MANDATES STATEMENT

The Committee adopts as its own the estimate of Federal mandates prepared by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to section 423 of the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE STATEMENT

No advisory committees within the meaning of section 5(b) of the Federal Advisory Committee Act were created by this legislation.

CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY STATEMENT

Pursuant to clause 3(d)(1) of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the Committee finds that the Constitutional authority for this legislation is provided in Article I, section 8, clause 3, which grants Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

APPLICABILITY TO LEGISLATIVE BRANCH

The Committee finds that the legislation does not relate to the terms and conditions of employment or access to public services or accommodations within the meaning of section 102(b)(3) of the Congressional Accountability Act.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE LEGISLATION

Section 1. Short Title.

Section 1 establishes the short title of the bill, the “Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act of 2004.”

Section 2. Increase in Penalties for Obscene, Indecent, and Profane Broadcasts.

Section 2 of the bill amends section 503(b)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 503(b)(2)) by increasing the existing forfeiture penalty cap for broadcast station licensees or permittees (hereinafter “licensee”) for broadcasting obscene, indecent, or profane materials from $27,500 per violation to $500,000 per violation. Additionally, section 2 increases the existing forfeiture penalty cap for other persons (nonlicensees) for uttering obscene, indecent, or profane material from $11,000 per violation to $500,000 per violation.

It should be noted that the $500,000 figure, while a significant increase from the current statutory penalties, is a ceiling, not a floor. The Committee expects that each complaint filed with the FCC will present different and unique facts that will justify a diverse range of penalties. This increased fining authority provides the FCC with the necessary discretion to adequately penalize a full range of violations, from, for example, particularly egregious offenses by large corporate actors to minor offenses by small companies or private individuals. Moreover, if the Commission opts to assess forfeiture penalties on a “per utterance” basis, then the Committee expects the Commission to take into account the multiplying effect of finding numerous violations when determining the level of penalty per utterance.

In setting the penalties for licensees and nonlicensees, the Committee was particularly careful to set a strong but appropriate penalty cap. The figure of $500,000 is not so high as to be disproportionate to a particularly egregious offense. Conversely, the amended penalty is high enough to provide a real deterrent to licensees and nonlicensees who may be tempted to push the envelope of decency for higher ratings or increased advertising revenues. Additionally, the Committee intentionally set the same forfeiture penalty cap for licensees as it did for nonlicensees. Regardless of the source of the obscene, indecent, or profane speech, the harmful impact on children is identical. See City of Cincinnati v. Discovery Network, Inc., 507 U.S. 410 (1993) (finding that a distinction between commercial and noncommercial newsracks bore “no relationship whatsoever to the particular interests that the city had asserted.”)

Finally, it is the Committee’s hope that these increased fines will provide an additional incentive for the Department of Justice to institute recovery proceedings to collect the outstanding penalties under section 504(a). Unfortunately, today’s forfeiture penalties are so inconsequential that it hardly justifies using the Department’s scarce resources. The revised penalty scheme in section 2 reverses that perverse incentive. In light of this change, it is anticipated that the Department will be more diligent in collecting FCC forfeiture penalties.

Section 3. Additional Factors in Indecency Penalties; Exception.

Section 3 amends section 503(b)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 503(b)(2)) by expanding the current factors the FCC is required to consider when levying a forfeiture penalty for violations of obscenity, indecency, or profanity. Under current law, the FCC must, with respect to the violator, take into account “the degree of culpability, any history of prior offenses, ability to pay, and such other matters as justice may require.” (47 U.S.C. 503(b)(3)(D)). Because this bill significantly increases the forfeiture authority of the FCC, the Committee found it necessary to provide the Commission with more direction in exercising its discretion to set appropriate penalties for indecency violations. Specifically, section 3 expands upon two factors: degree of culpability and ability to pay.

With respect to “degree of culpability,” section 2 requires the FCC to consider factors such as (1) whether the material uttered by the violator was live or recorded, scripted or unscripted; (2) whether the violator had a reasonable opportunity to review recorded or scripted programming or had a reasonable basis to believe live or unscripted programming would contain obscene, indecent or profane material; (3) if the violator originated live or unscripted programming, whether a time delay blocking mechanism was implemented for the programming; (4) the size of the viewing or listening audience; and (5) whether the programming was part of a children's television program under the Commission's children's television programming policy (47 C.F.R. 73.4050(c)).

The Committee views these factors as the best way to provide the FCC the necessary guidance to assess appropriate penalties. Whether the material was live or recorded, scripted or unscripted is relevant to the issue of intent of the violator who uttered the message. For instance, whether the violator had the reasonable opportunity to review programming will be a particularly meaningful factor in determining the level of culpability. If a licensee had a reasonable basis to believe live programming would contain obscene, indecent or profane content, perhaps based on previous violations by an artist for similar programming, then that is a factor the FCC should weigh to determine the culpability of the licensee.

The decision by an originator of content to institute a time delay of live or unscripted programming is also a relevant factor in setting the amount of any penalty as it speaks to the attempts taken by the network or broadcaster to protect its audience. The size of the listening or viewing audience is relevant to the issue of how many people viewed the obscene, indecent, or profane programming and, therefore, the scope of the harm. Finally, whether the programming was aired as part of a children's television program under the Commission's children's television programming policy is particularly important since the notion underlying the Act's prohibition of indecency is to protect children.

With respect to "ability to pay," section 2 requires the FCC to consider factors such as (1) whether the violator is a company or individual; and (2) if the violator is a company, the size of the company and the size of the market served. Generally, it is envisioned that a company will be subject to higher penalties than individuals, although certainly that will not always be the case. Additionally, the FCC should weigh and consider the relative size of a company, including such factors as revenues and number of employees, and should further examine the geographic size and population density of the market in setting any penalty.

Section 3 also creates a new section 503(b)(2)(G) in the Communications Act of 1934 that exempts from forfeiture penalties a broadcast station licensee that receives programming from a network organization, but is not owned or controlled, or under common ownership or control with, a network organization, for the broadcast of obscene, indecent, or profane material. This exemption only applies if: (1) the material was within live or recorded programming provided by the network organization to the licensee, and (2) the programming was recorded or scripted, and the licensee was not given a reasonable opportunity to review the programming in advance, or the programming was live or unscripted, and the licensee had no reasonable basis to believe the programming would contain obscene, indecent, or profane material.

Congress has given local station licensees special responsibilities to serve their local communities. The holder of a local station license, as a public trustee, is charged under section 73.658 of the Commission's regulations with the legal duty of accepting or rejecting network programs consistent with standards that are most appropriate for that community.

During its hearings, the Committee heard testimony indicating a tension between television networks and their non-network owned and operated broadcast station licensees regarding the licensees' unfettered right to reject programming for content reasons. Consistent with current law, a licensee should be able to preempt any network programming if it believes that such programming is not consistent with its local community standards. In order to properly reject programming, however, a local broadcaster must either be able to prescreen content or have some notice that inappropriate content may be included in live programming.

The new language in section 503(b)(2)(G) is designed to insulate local broadcasters from liability if they were not provided with a reasonable opportunity to review recorded or scripted programming, such as being given an advance copy of a show. Similarly, if the licensee has no reasonable basis to believe live or unscripted programming will contain inappropriate material, as would be suggested by programming with prior indecency violations, then fairness dictates that the licensee should not be held responsible for the broadcast of obscene, indecent, or profane material.

This provision also requires the FCC to define "network organization" for purposes of this subparagraph. The Committee expects the FCC to define this term to include all television networks. To the extent that business arrangements in other media, such as those involving radio networks or, perhaps, programming syndicators, similarly hinder the ability of licensees to reasonably determine whether programming will contain obscene, indecent, or profane material, then the Committee expects the Commission to determine whether the term should be expanded to include radio network or programming syndicators as well. The goal of this section is to shield non-network owned and operated affiliates from liability in situations where they have no reasonable opportunity to review scripted or recorded programming, or no reasonable basis to believe live or unscripted programming will contain obscene, indecent, or profane material. The Committee expects that the Commission will develop a complete record and define the term "network organization" in a way as to effectuate that intent.

The Committee made the distinction between network owned-and-operated station licensees (O&O) and non-network O&O station licensees because of the unique relationship between the network and the O&O. The O&O licensee is part of the network's corporate family, therefore any forfeiture penalty from an obscene, indecent, or profane broadcast by an O&O would run to the corporate parent. In light of this relationship, it is not unreasonable to expect that O&Os could receive special or favorable treatment as compared to the non-O&O station licensees in receiving advance copies of programming or advance notice of controversial content. Given their proximity within the same corporate structure, it is reasonable to attribute knowledge about programming from the network to an O&O. For this reason, the Committee did not include O&Os within the liability shield contained in the new section 503(b)(2)(G).

Section 4. Indecency Penalties for Nonlicensees.

Section 4 amends section 503(b)(5) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 503(b)(5)) to streamline the process governing how the FCC may apply the prohibition of broadcasting obscene, indecent, or profane material to nonlicensees, such as networks and individuals. Section 4 allows the FCC to pursue forfeiture penalties against nonlicensees upon a determination that a person uttered obscene, indecent, or profane material that was broadcast by a broadcast station licensee, if the person is determined to have “willfully or intentionally” made the utterance.

The FCC currently has the authority to assess forfeiture penalties upon nonlicensees, but unlike 503(b)(2)(A) which allows the FCC to seek a forfeiture penalty against licensees on the first violation, section 503(b)(5) requires a cumbersome, two-step process for nonlicensees that first requires the issuance of a citation, and then a subsequent similar violation before the FCC may issue a Notice of Apparent Liability. The current law is particularly unwieldy, making it difficult for the FCC to use section 503(b)(5) to enforce indecency laws against performers, who are increasingly using public broadcast airwaves in inappropriate ways, often in violation of the FCC’s indecency rules. It is the hope of the Committee that amending section 503(b)(5) will make the application of obscenity, indecency, and profanity laws against networks and individuals less burdensome, thus increasing enforcement against these groups.

Under the plain meaning of the current 503(b)(5), the language applies to both networks and individuals. Section 503(b)(1) says that “any person” who violates 18 U.S.C. 1464 shall be liable for a forfeiture penalty. “Person” is defined in section 3(32) of the Communications Act as an “individual, partnership, association, joint-stock company, trust or corporation.” Therefore, any person who under 18 U.S.C. 1464 “utters any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication” can be found liable. Since the creation of 18 U.S.C. 1464, the FCC has used this authority to hold licensees responsible for obscene, indecent, or profane broadcasts that they “uttered” using “radio communication.” Networks can be considered to have “uttered” indecent material over “radio communication” in a similar way that a broadcast station does. Networks are originating material that comes into the home over-the-air. Accordingly, the Committee believes there is no obstacle that would prevent the application of section 503(b)(5) to network organizations.

There is also no bar from using section 503(b)(5) to hold individuals responsible for their intentional or willful speech on broadcast television or radio. This year’s Super Bowl halftime show highlighted how the actions of individual performers can drastically alter the tenor of programming aimed at an audience filled with children. An individual can be held liable under this provision because it is clearly the individual who “utters” the offending language or material over “radio communication.”

The Committee uses the phrase “willfully or intentionally” to protect nonlicensees, both networks and individuals, from being held liable for inadvertent or accidental speech. The willful or intentional standard is meant to capture those incidents where an individual intentionally utters material, consciously and deliberately, which they know will be broadcast. However, the standard is not so strict that a person must know that his or her speech is legally obscene, indecent or profane. It is enough that he or she intentionally makes the utterance that he or she knows is being or will be broadcast.

The Committee believes that the bill poses no danger to the First Amendment constitutional rights of individuals or corporations. The underlying statute, 18 U.S.C. 1464, applies to “whoever utters any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication”. The FCC has interpreted this provision to apply to any over-the-air broadcast, whether by television or radio. The language of the statute, on its face, applies to the “utterer” of speech disseminated by radio communication, whether uttered by an individual or corporate entity. Courts have held that there is a significant societal interest in speech, which is distinct from the speaker. See First Nat. Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 777 (1978). “It is the type of speech indispensable to decision making in a democracy, and this is no less true because the speech comes from a corporation rather than an individual. The inherent worth of the speech in terms of its capacity for informing the public does not depend upon the identity of its source, whether corporation, association, union, or individual.” Ibid (citations omitted).

The speech by any “person” is subject to a strict scrutiny analysis if a government regulation is a content-based one. Strict scrutiny requires a compelling government interest, and a regulation that achieves the goal using the least restrictive means. (Sable Communications of California v. FCC, 492 U.S. 115, 126 (1989)). The Supreme Court has already determined that there is a compelling government interest in protecting children from indecent speech disseminated by radio communication. Because broadcast media has a “uniquely pervasive presence” in the lives of all Americans and because broadcasting is “uniquely assessable to children,” the government has the power to restrict the over-the-air broadcast of indecent language in certain circumstances. (FCC v. Pacifica, 438 U.S. 726, 749 (1978)). Additionally, the D.C. Circuit has found that restricting indecent speech in over-the-air broadcasts between the hours of 6 a.m. and 10 p.m. is the least restrictive means of achieving the goal of protecting children. (Action for Children’s Television v. FCC, 58 F.3d 654, 666 (1995)). Since the D.C. Circuit has upheld reasonable restrictions on the broadcast of indecent programming by licensees, there is no reason why such reasonable restrictions would not also be constitutional as applied to nonlicensees. As noted by the D.C. Circuit court in the Action for Children’s Television v. FCC case, “whatever chilling effect may be said to inhere in the regulation of indecent speech, these have existed ever since the Supreme Court first upheld the FCC’s enforcement of section 1464 of the Radio Act.” Ibid.

Section 5. Deadlines for Action on Complaints.

Section 5 amends section 503(b) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 503(b)) by adding a new paragraph (7) which establishes deadlines for action by the FCC on obscenity, indecency, or profanity complaints. The language requires the FCC to, within 180 days after a complaint is filed, issue the required notice to the licensee, permittee or person making the utterance under paragraphs (3) (which allows notice and hearing before the Commission or an administrative law judge) or (4) (which allows the Commission to issue a Notice of Apparent Liability), or notify the licensee, permittee or person and complainant that the Commission has determined not to issue either notice. If the Commission issues a notice, it must either issue a forfeiture order or dismiss the complaint within 270 days after the complaint was filed, unless the penalty has been paid or the violator has entered into a settlement.

The Committee heard testimony indicating there were delays in the FCC evaluating and pursuing obscenity, indecency and profanity complaints. Indeed, according to the Commission, in 2002, 13,922 complaints were filed involving 345 programs. In 2003, 240,350 complaints were filed involving 318 programs. According to the FCC, there were 664 complaints pending at the end of 2002, and there were 239,982 complaints pending at the end of 2003 (although many are multiple complaints about specific programs). Additionally, only seven Notices of Apparent Liability were issued in 2002 (although one was withdrawn) and three Notices of Apparent Liability were issued in 2003. Generally, these Notices of Apparent Liability are issued over a year from date of complaint. The Committee is hopeful that this new paragraph will ensure that complaints do not languish at the FCC and are expeditiously brought to completion.

Section 6. Additional Remedies for Indecent Broadcast.

Section 6 adds a new subsection (c) to section 503 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 503) that provides the FCC additional remedies for obscene, indecent, or profane broadcasts. If the Commission determines that any broadcast station licensee has broadcast obscene, indecent, or profane material, the Commission may, in addition to any forfeiture penalty, require the violator to broadcast public service announcements (PSAs) that serve the educational and informational needs of children. These PSAs may be required to reach an audience that is up to five times the size of the audience that was estimated to have been reached by the offending broadcast. It is hoped that this remedial action will help to counter the negative effects brought on by the initial obscene, indecent or profane broadcast.

Section 7. License Disqualification for Violations of Indecency Prohibitions.

Section 7 adds a new subsection (d) to section 503 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 503) which requires the FCC to consider a violation of obscenity, indecency, or profanity prohibitions when examining whether the applicant lacks the character or other qualifications required to operate a station under sections 308(b) and 310(d) of the Communications Act of 1934. The FCC may only use the violation for such purposes if a forfeiture penalty has been paid or a forfeiture penalty has been determined by the Commission or an administrative law judge and such penalty is not under review, and has not been reversed, by a court of competent jurisdiction. This language only requires the FCC to consider a violation in its examinations under section 308(b) and 310(d), but does not require any particular outcome.

Section 308(b) states that all applications for station licenses, or modifications or renewals of licenses, must set forth facts that show the applicant has the character and other necessary qualifications to operate the station. Section 310(d) states that no station license may be transferred, assigned, or disposed of in any manner, without an application to the FCC, but that any application shall be disposed of as if an application for a license was being made under section 308. Therefore, in any request for change of control, or modification of, a license, the FCC will now be required to consider the effect of an obscenity, indecency, or profanity violation to the issue of character. It is the Committee's intent that the character considerations under this section should be applicable to those persons attempting to purchase additional station licenses, or applying to modify their existing licenses.

Section 8. License Renewal Consideration of Violations of Indecency Prohibitions.

Section 8 amends section 309(k) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 309(k)) by adding a new paragraph (5). This language requires the FCC to treat any obscenity, indecency, or profanity violation of section 503(b) as a "serious violation" for purposes of license renewal. Such a violation may only be considered as a "serious violation" if the forfeiture penalty has been paid or a forfeiture penalty has been determined by the Commission or an administrative law judge and such penalty is not under review, and has not been reversed, by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Under the current section 309(k), a licensee has a presumption of renewal if: (1) the station has served the public interest, convenience, and necessity; (2) there have been no serious violations by the licensee of the Act or the rules and regulations of the Commission; and (3) there have been no other violations by the licensee of this Act or the rules and regulations of the Commission, which taken together, would constitute a pattern of abuse. The amendment to 309(k) removes the presumption for entities that violate the obscenity, indecency, and profanity restrictions by deeming an obscenity, indecency, or profanity offense to be a "serious violation."

To be clear, this language reverses the presumption that has only been in effect since 1996. Prior to 1996, even without a presumption of renewal, broadcast licenses were routinely and commonly renewed. This section is designed to add another factor to the decision to renew a license. Under the current language in section 309(k), the FCC must continue to examine mitigating factors and examine other less severe alternatives to non-renewal.

Finally, in the situation where one licensee holds the licenses for a number of different stations, it is not the intent of the Committee to hold each station responsible for the obscene, indecent, or profane conduct of other stations. Therefore, in the event of license renewal, the offenses of one station should only apply to the renewal or revocation of that particular station, and should not be imputed to the other stations held by that licensee.

Section 9. License Revocation for Violations of Indecency Prohibitions.

Section 9 amends section 312 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 312) by adding a new subsection (h). The new language requires the FCC to commence a hearing to consider license revocation if, during the term of the license, a licensee accrues three or more obscenity, indecency, or profanity violations. The FCC may only use the violations for such purposes if a forfeiture penalty has been paid or a forfeiture penalty has been determined by the Commission or an administrative law judge and such penalty is not under review, and has not been reversed, by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Nothing in this provision requires the FCC to revoke a license upon three indecency violations, but only requires that the Commission hold a hearing to consider license revocation. Moreover, nothing in this section requires the FCC to wait until the third violation to revoke a license. If a first or second violation of the obscenity, indecency, or profanity laws was egregious enough to warrant holding a revocation hearing or actually revoking a license, nothing in this Act should be construed to prohibit that result.

Similar to license renewal discussed in section 8, where one licensee holds the licenses for a number of different stations, it is not the intent of the Committee to hold each station responsible for the obscene, indecent, or profane conduct of other stations. Therefore, in the event of license revocation, the offenses of one station should only apply to the renewal or revocation of that particular station license, and should not be imputed to the other stations held by that licensee.

Finally, if the Commission opts to assess penalties on a “per utterance” basis, then the Committee urges the Commission use caution and to consider that assessing penalties on a “per utterance” basis may have the highly punitive effect of referring a license to a revocation proceeding on the basis of a single broadcast program.

Section 10. Required Contents of Annual Reports of the Commission.

Section 10 adds reporting requirements relating to FCC action on obscenity, indecency, and profanity complaints to be included as part of the Commission’s annual report under 4(k)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 154(k)(2)). Specifically, the FCC must report on: (1) the number of annual obscenity, indecency, and profanity complaints received by the Commission, and the number of programs to which such complaints relate; (2) the number of dismissed or denied complaints; (3) the number of complaints pending at the end of the year; (4) the number of notices issued by the Commission under section 503(b)(3) and (4); (5) for each notice, a statement of the amount of the proposed penalty, the program, station, and corporate parent (or any non-corporate entity with control over the station) to which the notice was issued, the length of time between filing of the complaint and the date the notice was issued, and the status of the proceeding; (6) the number of forfeiture orders issued under section 503(b); and (7) for each forfeiture order, a statement of the amount assessed by the order, the program, station and corporate parent (or any non-corporate entity with control over the station) to which it was issued, whether the licensee paid the order, the amount paid, and instances the licensee refused to pay, whether the Department of Justice brought an action for recovery to collect the penalty.

Section 11 is a sense of Congress that the broadcast television station licensees should reinstate a family viewing policy for broadcasters. The family viewing policy is a policy similar to the policy in the National Association of Broadcaster's code of conduct that was in effect from 1975 to 1983.

Empirical research shows that 71% of prime time television shows on the four major broadcast networks contain some form of sexual content, and that of children age 8-18 years, 86% of children have radios, and 65% of children have televisions, in their bedroom. Therefore, the Committee notes that the need for a voluntary industry family viewing policy is an appropriate response to the growing threat from indecent programming.

Section 12. Implementation.

Section 12(a) requires the Commission to prescribe regulations to implement the amendments made by this Act within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

Section 12(b) makes the Act and the amendments made by this Act prospective in nature. Any material broadcast before the date of enactment of this Act is not covered by this Act.

Section 12(c) makes clear that section 708 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 608) relating to separability applies to this Act and the amendments made by this Act. The inclusion of this separability clause in no way implies that any provision of this Act is legally suspect or infirm. The Committee strongly believes that every section of H.R. 3717 is constitutional and would withstand judicial scrutiny.
